The oppression and abusive treatment of women has been built into the cultures of humanity since the origin of the species. The man-made one-God religions [Judaism, Christianity and Islam] in particular have epitomized this male gonad-driven ideology; an ideology that has had and still has an incredibly negative impact on all elements of society, from business and education to politics. During the Egyptian revolution in 2011 a young woman dressed in the attire prescribed by men for Muslim women was set upon by government troops, beaten, stripped of her outer garments and left prostrate in the street. Someone with a cell phone camera photographed her defilement and posted it on the Internet, revealing to the world that she was wearing a blue bra. Washington Post staffer Sally Quinn wrote a scathing column, equating the blue bra with the unquenchable desire of women to escape from the id-driven dominance of males—which has been the bane of humanity since the origin of the species—and bring their innate compassion and wisdom to human life. This book explains in detail why and how males have prevented humanity from achieving its full potential, and outlines basic changes that are essential before that can be achieved.
