France and Europe, being the first year of the primacy of First Consul Napoleon Bonaparte, witnessed an event of curious importance in the municipal history of the city of Bordeaux. A long and brilliant procession, in which military uniforms were in great prominence, and the national and municipal authorities were surrounded by cavalymen, artillerists, and detachments of the National Guard, started one day from the old church known as l'Eglise des Feuillants, escorting a sarcophagus which had just been extracted from the vaults of the church, and wended its way towards the Museum of the city, in which the sarcophagus was to find its final resting-place. The purpose of this imposing ceremony was to do honour to the remains of a former mayor of the city, Michel Eyquem, Lord of Montaigne, the immortal author of the Essays, which had been lying in the Eglise des Feuillants since the first of May, 1593, when they had been laid there by order of the great writers
