Why is it impossible for Stephanie to get Brock out of her mind?

Stephanie Wallace had a successful practice and she doesn't need the constant headache of Brock Lewis messing up a good thing. She knows that her father is counting on her. He's the coach of a college football team. All the hopes and dreams are riding on Brock's shoulders.

Brock has never had any problems getting a woman in the past. He tries to deny himself the feeling that he gets around Stephanie, but it becomes like an everlasting obsession. He knows that eventually his passions are going to get the best of him. His only hope is that Stephanie will be able to pull back before it's too late.

Brock has never been a very good patient, but maybe Stephanie's bedside manner can prove to him once and for all that doctors don't have to be all business.

They know that they are risking everything by being together, but how are they supposed to deny their feelings? What happens when a house call turns into something more? Can they hide their obvious attraction and keep her father from finding out about their relationship and the secret that they hold together?
